How to Use This Book

Every lesson set covers 7 stages. Stages 1 and 2 (Word List and Word Sort) share one combined page; Stages 3–7 each get their own page. A colored badge, an icon, and a 7-dot progress bar appear at the top of every page so you always know which stage you're on.

 Stage 1: Word List

 Stage 2: Word Sort

 Stage 3: Word Meaning

 Stage 4: Reading Fluency

 Stage 5: Proofreading

 Stage 6: Phonetic & Decoding

 Stage 7: Working Space

A second badge in the top-left corner names the pattern you're working on (for example, "_age"), so you can also tell which of the 27 lesson sets a page belongs to at a glance.

populace	the ordinary people of a country or region	_____
carapace	the hard upper shell of a turtle, crab, or similar creature	_____
pinnacle	a small boat that serves a larger ship	_____

Reading Fluency — _ace

Read the passage aloud. Then find and circle every word that uses the _ace pattern.

The Queen's Terrace

The queen stepped onto the stone terrace outside the palace, a gold necklace shining at her throat. Below, smoke rose from an old furnace that had once been a menace to the whole town. She gave a small grimace at the smell, then turned back toward the cool marble surface of the steps. Deep in the cellar, the pomace left from pressing grapes still covered every surface she touched. Even so, she found solace in knowing the whole populace would soon taste the wine. The preface of her grandmother's old cookbook, its cover as tough as a turtle's carapace, still described the little pinnacle that once carried barrels down the river.

Now read it again, aiming for a smooth, natural pace.

 Copy the entire story below, underlining each whole word that uses the _ace pattern.

Proofreading – _ace

Circle the misspelled word in each sentence. Write it correctly below.

- The queen wore a sparkling neckis to the palace ball.
- A dark menis hung over the harbor all week.
- He tried to hide his grimis of pain after the fall.
- The old furnis kept the whole house warm in winter.
- She found solis in the quiet garden.

Reading Fluency — _age

Read the passage aloud. Then find and circle every word that uses the _age pattern.

The Village Rebuilds

The small village had survived a long sea voyage worth of stories. When the storm caused damage to the old cottage by the shore, the villagers found the courage to rebuild it together. They sent a message to the next town asking for extra storage space for their supplies. Before they could leave, someone had to manage the pile of baggage stacked by the door, and wrap a fresh bandage around the dog's paw. The average family might have called it too much work, but they refused to treat the old cottage like garbage. Instead, they let a hostage of cabbage leaves sit in a box marked for postage, ready to forage for more supplies at the next village package drop.

Now read it again, aiming for a smooth, natural pace.

 Copy the entire story below, underlining each whole word that uses the _age pattern.

Reading Fluency — _ate

Read the passage aloud. Then find and circle every word that uses the _ate pattern.

The Pirate’s Map

The old pirate map showed an island with a mild climate and an intricate network of caves. It took a delicate touch to follow the accurate directions without tearing the fragile paper. Anyone fortunate enough to find the treasure would need to be an advocate for sharing it fairly. A private letter from the senate arrived that morning, written in literate, careful hand. It described the ultimate plan: a delegate would travel to a place with a temperate climate, taste the local chocolate, and report back on the strange, spicy palate of the region. It felt like a desperate request for such a moderate reward, but the immediate answer from the crew was yes.

Now read it again, aiming for a smooth, natural pace.

Reading Fluency — _ble

Read the passage aloud. Then find and circle every word that uses the _ble pattern.

The Humble Climber

It seemed like a terrible idea to scramble up the wet rocks, but the climber didn't tremble. She kept her grip stable and moved with sensible, careful steps. At the top, she gave a humble nod, as if the climb had been nothing special at all. Grandpa kept an old wooden table covered in a bubble of dust near the marble fireplace. He would scribble notes on pebble-sized scraps of paper, warning that it was possible the old floor might rumble and crumble if too many people stood there at once. It sounded horrible, but he kept a small tin thimble nearby anyway, just in case anyone needed to sew the rug back together, calm and noble as ever, refusing to tumble into panic.

Now read it again, aiming for a smooth, natural pace.

The Lake Project

The official report explained why the decision was so crucial for the town's financial future. Without a judicial review, the new artificial lake project might not have been beneficial to local farmers after all. The town later held a small commercial for its own social club, filming it against a glacial backdrop of ice and snow. A facial mask made from local clay was said to help with the cold, and people of every racial background lined up to try it, curious whether the claims were true.

The Physician Magician

The town's only physician also worked as an amateur magician on weekends. Her neighbor, an electrician by trade, often joked that she was a better tactician than he was, since she always knew how to plan her tricks. A visiting technician came to fix the stage lights before every show. The clinic down the street employed more than one skilled worker: a dietician who planned healthy meals, a musician who played calming songs in the waiting room, and a careful logician who solved scheduling puzzles no one else could manage. Nearby, an optician, a clinician, and even a local beautician shared the same building, while a politician once joked that only a mortician worked longer hours than all of them combined.

The Great Bicycle Race

Every vehicle in the race had to steer around at least one obstacle made of ice. My uncle, who once rode his bicycle across the whole country, said finishing at all would be a miracle. He pointed out that even a single particle of dust on the track could send a racer into a spin. Every morning followed the same cycle: a slow circle around the block on a rusty bicycle, then breakfast at the kitchen cubicle her father built by the window. In winter, an icicle would hang from the porch until the sun melted it, and every spring she would recycle the old tricycle into a planter, writing an article about it for the school paper, careful never to touch the cuticle of her thumb with wet paint or let the cat's curious tentacle-like tail knock it over.

Trudging to the Lodge

They had to trudge through deep snow to reach the mountain lodge, following a narrow ridge above the valley. At the door, the old judge who owned the cabin made everyone pledge to wipe their boots before stepping past the hedge of frozen bushes outside. Every step toward the edge of the cliff made her want to dodge back, though the old dog refused to budge. Someone had left a plate of fudge on a narrow ledge nearby, and a gentle nudge from her brother nearly sent it tumbling. Beyond a rocky wedge in the trail, an old grudge between two hikers had once started right there, leaving a smudge of mud on someone's badge as they argued near the sledge tracks by the bridge.

Grandpa's Soup Night

Grandpa used an old wooden ladle to stir the soup on the griddle, while the dog tried to meddle by sniffing at every bundle on the counter. As the fire began to dwindle, he told us a riddle to guess before dinner, and we all huddled closer to hear it. For lunch, Grandpa made a big pot of noodle soup while the poodle slept in its cradle-shaped basket by the fire. My little cousin liked to doodle pictures of horses wearing a bridle, then light a candle so we could see them better. Later, we helped him saddle the old handlebar bike, kindle a small campfire, and paddle across the pond before coming back to cuddle with the dog.

The Raffle Scuffle

A small scuffle broke out near the raffle table when two kids reached for the last ticket at once. Their teacher tried to muffle a laugh as she stepped in, though the whole thing seemed to baffle the younger children watching nearby. Within a minute everyone had gone back to their seats to shuffle playing cards instead. That afternoon, someone found an old rifle case in the attic next to a canvas duffle bag. Inside was nothing but a trifle of old photographs and a recipe for waffles, its edges beginning to ruffle from age. A cold draft made someone sniffle, and for a moment it seemed wise to stifle a sneeze rather than send dust flying everywhere.

The Creaking Door

A rusty hinge creaked as the door swung open, and a strange draft made everyone cringe. Slowly, a shape began to emerge from the shadows near the edge of the room. It was just the old barge captain, come to charge in from the storm before the two paths could merge. It was hard to change the plan once the storm began to surge across the wide range of hills nearby. A large old barge sat near the shore, its rope frayed at the fringe, ready to lounge uselessly until someone tried to forge a new one. Nobody wanted to feel the urge to purge their supplies, but a candle left to singe the table gave everyone one small binge of panic, until they spotted a soggy sponge and an orange life vest nearby.

The Beagle and the Eagle

The little beagle liked to wriggle free and chase the eagle's shadow across the jungle floor. It would struggle to climb the fallen triangle of logs, then snuggle down for a nap in the leaves, tail curled at a strange angle. The little eagle, still too young to fly, would wiggle free and giggle at the strangest things, like the sound of a distant bugle. It liked to jiggle loose feathers into a tangle of twigs and gargle water from a small stream that seemed to gurgle all day long. Sometimes it would juggle tiny pebbles near a rectangle of sunlight, careful not to bungle its landing whenever the family beagle tried to smuggle away one of its toys.

Onions and Opinions

Her loyal dog was more than a pet — it was a true companion. In her opinion, chopping a fresh scallion was the fastest way to wake up a sleepy soup. Millions of onions were shipped from that union of farms each year, their skins as vermillion as a sunset. At the family reunion, cousins from every branch showed up: nearly a million stories were told, or so it felt, and even a distant billion-mile joke about the stars got a laugh. Someone's grandmother hosted a quiet communion before dinner, sharing a slice of onion bread as tradition, while an uncle nursed a sore bunion and joked he ruled his recliner like it was his own small dominion.

The Curious Attic

Cleaning the whole attic turned out to be a laborious job, but the curious boy kept digging through various boxes anyway. He was oblivious to the time passing until his studious sister found a notorious old newspaper clipping that made the whole afternoon feel glorious after all. Her older brother was often furious about small things, though everyone agreed his previous temper had been far worse. It was a serious improvement, and no longer tedious to be around him. One obvious reason was dubious at best — he claimed a hilarious dream had calmed him down — but after a fever left him briefly delirious, the whole family agreed something real had actually changed.

The Detective's Clue

The detective was known for making a decisive choice under pressure. She believed the fugitive had a clear motive for leaving town, and the sticky residue of adhesive tape on the window frame seemed like a positive clue. It was going to take a massive amount of work to prove it. The detective preferred neat cursive notes to messy typing, staying active late into the night on every case. She knew an explosive temper wouldn't help her get answers from a native witness who seemed almost abusive when questioned. Rather than give a negative report, she tried a more creative approach the next morning.

Grandma by the Fire

A thin trickle of rain ran down the window as the fire began to crackle in the hearth. Grandma gave a soft chuckle and rubbed her sore ankle, the stars beginning to twinkle outside. She reached for her belt buckle, a small freckle of flour still on her knuckle from baking. By breakfast, someone had already dropped a jar of pickles on the floor, leaving a wrinkle in the tablecloth where they slipped. Dad tried to tackle the mess before it spread, careful not to tickle the cat sniffing nearby. Someone else began to sprinkle cinnamon over the pancakes, and the whole kitchen seemed to sparkle under the morning light.

The Lost Lamb

Snow had made her fingers numb by the time she managed to climb over the fallen limb blocking the path. Near the old stone tomb, she found a tiny lamb shivering by the door jamb, and gave it the last crumb of bread from her pocket. The little lamb wandered too close to an old wooden comb lying in the grass, and someone's thumb got a splinter trying to pick it up. Nearby, a rusted training bomb shell, long since harmless, sat as a strange lawn ornament near the fence, plumb straight against the old stone wall.

In spring, the whole class would sing a song about the sound of a gong ringing across the valley. A bee's sting once sent everyone running, but the teacher stayed strong and calm, tying a string around the swollen finger until help arrived. Every spring, the class would sing the same old song before the swings outside were even open for the day. Someone always got stung by a bee near the flower ring, and had to hang back while the rest of us continued to bring supplies for the picnic. It was a small thing, really, but it always made the morning feel longer than it truly was, until laughter rang out and everyone sang together again.

The Sinking Car

The old car began to sink lower in the mud, its engine giving one last weak honk. Dad had to crank the handle by hand while we watched, unsure whether to think it was funny or worry the sweater would shrink in the rain. By the time we got to the ice rink, our notebook pages were still blank. Down at the bank, someone had spilled a bottle of ink across a stack of pink forms just as the old elevator seemed to sink a little with every use. A worker gave a quick thank you and moved a pile of junk away from the door before it could blink shut on someone's coat. Outside, a tank truck idled by the trunk of an old tree, while a curious skunk tried to drink from a puddle nearby.

The Famous Chef

The famous chef was known for being surprisingly generous with his portions, never pompous about his own skill. After an enormous day of travel, the ravenous guests found his cooking absolutely gorgeous, and more than a little humorous, given the size of the plates. It was hard not to feel a little nervous, and maybe even jealous, watching the tremendous crowd gather for the joyous festival downtown. Someone spilled a viscous puddle of syrup near the porous wooden stage, but no one seemed callous about it — the whole event felt fabulous anyway, with numerous performers giving a vigorous show until sunset.

Market Day

The old church steeple could be seen from every corner of town, standing over a simple stone temple square. On market day, people lined up with ample baskets of apples, careful not to trample the fallen maple leaves, or accidentally topple a stall. At the market, a vendor arranged a triple stack of shiny apples beside a sample tray of jam, each one a slightly different shade of red or purple. Nearby, a staple gun clicked as someone hung a paper sign, and a small ripple of laughter spread when a child left a dimple-shaped thumbprint in the wet paint. It was, by any example, a multiple-purpose kind of day, simple in every sense, ending with an old couple slowly folding their crumpled shopping list into a pocket.

The Antique Shop

The old shop sold nothing but antique furniture, each piece with a unique story. A visiting artist stopped to give a gentle critique of the painting technique used on one opaque glass vase, admiring the careful technique it must have taken to make. The antique shop had an oblique way of arranging its shelves, as if organized by a small clique of collectors rather than any real system. A tiny boutique next door sold nothing but old brass door parts, each with its own quiet mystique. Down the street, a busy mosque and a bakery serving warm bisque filled the block with the sound of a distant engine's torque, and a faded ceramic plaque marked the corner where it all began.

Reading Fluency — _sia

Read the passage aloud. Then find and circle every word that uses the _sia pattern.

A Trip Across Asia

After the accident, the doctors worried he might have amnesia, unable to remember his trip across Asia. In the hospital garden, someone had planted rows of freesia that smelled, his nurse joked, like the ambrosia of the old myths — sweet enough to cure anything. The old professor loved to compare notes on fantasia music from around the world: a folk tune from Persia, a lullaby once sung in Malaysia, and a march linked to old Prussia and modern Russia alike. He kept a bottle of magnesia on his desk for headaches, and once studied a rare condition called aphasia while researching the history of Rhodesia and Tunisia for a paper on old maps, held together in a hall that still felt, to him, like a small gymnasia of ideas.

Now read it again, aiming for a smooth, natural pace.

 Copy the entire story below, underlining each whole word that uses the _sia pattern.
